Rust Belt Rising Polling from Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin: High Costs and Other Issues on Voters' Minds

Summary:

Rust Belt Rising polling of Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin finds a nearly-even split outlook on President Trump and the economy. Given how close these key electoral states are—both statewide and in many districts Democrats aim to win back—it is vital that the limited opportunities candidates have to make impressions on voters are attuned to what people are concerned about.

The candidate who can empathetically speak to what people are struggling with by offering a vision for solutions will be at an advantage to win amidst such tight margins.

We found that health care is the cost people are most worried about. The related challenge of affording prescription drugs followed next.

Though people in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin saw the economy as on the right track in May, 67% of those we polled still cannot handle an unexpected expense of five thousand dollars. Thus, candidates should talk about getting these specific cost areas under control and creating better-paying jobs that give people the security to handle emergencies and still retire.

We polled 1,751 likely voters in Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin on May 7-9, 2019. The respondents were split between Clinton and Trump voters, with the majority being Obama voters.

More Key Takeaways:

- In rank order, people worry most about not being able to retire, emergency expenses, losing benefits/pension, and higher monthly expenses. Many of these concerns ultimately relate to what people are making versus bills these days.

- Among companies, people are most outraged by pharmaceuticals, health care companies, oil and gas, then debt companies.
- Working-age people believe the system favoring the rich as preventing them from economic success.
- Voters see lobbyists for big corporations and wealthy donors as a big problem, followed by CEOs putting profits before fair wages.
- Those issues ranked higher for people as “big problems” than a tax code favoring the wealthy and automation and outsourcing. All of these matters ranked considerably higher as a concern than illegal immigration, suggesting that President Trump believes Midwestern voters to be more fixated on this issue as a problem than they actually are. Our candidates can tap into issues people more view to be actual impediments on their life.
- Framing raising minimum wage around costs polled better than an anti-company frame.
- The majority of people said that becoming economically successful is somewhere between not easy to very hard.

Messages

Six messages utilizing hard work, costs, and optimism were rated closely together, but in this order:

1	"The cost of living has skyrocketed in this country while wages haven't budged in years, and it's squeezing the middle-class. We need to pass laws that get drug prices under control, create educational opportunities that lead to good paying jobs and can be paid for while working part-time, and give the middle-class a tax cut so they can actually afford to put some money away for the future."
2	"In America, we've lost sight of the value of hard work and the people who do it. We need to look out for the people that are the backbone of America and built the country. That includes skills-training programs to make sure people have a path to a good-paying job even if they aren't going to college and tax cuts for working people instead of the rich."
3	"Decades ago people had job security and economic security, but now most people are one hospital bill or layoff away from ruin, and it's harder than ever for people to retire securely after life of hard work. I'll fight to secure retirement, stop health care bills from bankrupting people, and fight outsourcing that continues to destroy communities' way of life."
4	"We need to focus on making sure everyone has the opportunity to succeed if they work hard. That means a strong education system with a path for everyone, a growing economy where businesses are creating jobs, and investing in jobs of the future so America is competitive in the global economy."
5	"I'll work to make sure that our laws are written to benefit the people who elected me, not the corporations that donated the most money. I'll fix the tax code by closing loopholes and lowering taxes on the middle class to make America more fair for working people, funding priorities like schools and jobs."
6	"I believe in a brighter future for America, and that the American people can solve the problems that face us. We can build world-class schools, rebuild our infrastructure, and make our economy stronger by building the jobs of the future. If politicians could put aside the partisan fights and get to work, there are a lot of great ideas out there that we could all agree on."
